We all are aware of the statement that India is a land of goddesses, where woman is held supreme and worshipped. However, the sad reality is that half a million women are barred to take birth in this "holy land of goddesses". The biological advantage which a female has over the male is negated when the child is killed yes killed brutally by her own relatives as soon as she opens her gentle eyes in the world. But what can we do? We, at personal level brush such grave issues under the carpet by labeling it to be a personal matter of a family.

Though one might say this matter has received consideration in our judiciary but how far have we been successful to mitigate or solve this problem? The census might suggest that the scenario of the sex ratio has increased, but one can't take it on the face value. The workers for such concerns argue that a woman is the sapling for a generation or the root from which an entire dynasty / empire might stem out. But my plea is that instead of looking at women as bearers of the generations to come, give them the right to be born as a human being and nothing beyond that because every human being has the right to life. This fundamental right be snatched away from women who hold up half the sky.

The magnanimity of such a discrimination against life itself is the grief that pains me the most. With this campaign I aim to bring to the forefront a new perspective towards the whole gender issue which has poisoned our society so far if not, social change altogether. It's high time that we saw women as a separate category or a deviance from the normal. They too have the right to be born and born free and live a liberated life of their own choice.
